Abstract

The 20-year vision document of Horizon 1404, approved by the Expediency Discernment Council, became the basis of the five-year development plans for the fourth year onwards from 2005 to 1404. Simultaneously with the implementation of development plans, how to achieve the goals of the vision document in line with the five-year development plans were questioned. According to the vision document's nature, this question can be considered in various economic, cultural, social, and political dimensions. Therefore, according to this article's purpose, the effectiveness of political development in five-year development plans following the 20-year vision document of Horizon 1404 was studied. The five-year plan documents from the fourth plan onward were used to achieve the result, and the method was the descriptive and library studies. The study's result was that the political development approach in the fourth, fifth, and sixth five-year development plans fluctuated dramatically. In the final summary, this approach has not had the desired effect.
